

Why do you think some Christians might not regularly invite their friends to church?

What do you think about the concept that people first belong, then believe, and then behaviour changes?

Where do you think are the wrong places to get together with non-Christians?

How relevant and appropriate are your church services for your non-Christian friends?
Why?

Have we lost confidence in the Gospel? How does your answer translate to what actually happens when it comes to sharing your faith?

Do you think embarrassment impacts our ability to invite people to events or church? If so which ones? How can we get over that?

What is the best thing you have been invited to?

How well do you need to know someone before you invite them to something organised by christians/the Church?

Where do you get together with your non-Christian friends? Could you do something different to create deeper conversations in that space?

In one survey, 73% of students said they would go to church if invited by a friend? What does that say to us?

Is there a place for occasional 'appropriate church services' for your friends? What would these look like?

What social activities, or events with a slight Christian edge and more evangelistic event could you organise?

What is the best/worst way to invite someone to a Christian event?

Thinking about your friends and the people you know — what do you feel comfortable inviting them to?

How do we welcome people into our faith community?

If there was a physical location where you came to faith, do you think that location works today?